ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Writing acknowledgements is one of the happiest occasions since it provides the opportunity to recall and remember all the important people in one's life. For a scholar, there is no division between his professional life and his personal life. The process of learning often leaps out of his study room and percolates into his social and personal life. In due course, some human bonds emerge so strong that they prove to be perpetual teacher, collaborator and guide whose teaching and inspiration become an integral part of the scholar's life. I have been no exception.

Although there is no end to learning, a zenith is surely found to be there in the domain of formal education. It had always been the dream of my father that I reached this zenith and pursued my formal education up to the stage of Ph. D. From the primary school level till the days of writing this thesis, his belief in me and in my academic pursuit has been unwavering. Apart from providing moral and material support, he always inspired me to take the dialectical approach to reach the ultimate truth. Not just as a son, but also as a student of political philosophy my indebtedness to him is eternal.

My father taught me very early in my life that the best guide is the one who is most sympathetic. My supervisor, Prof. Prakash C. Jain embodies this ideal guide in all its manifestations. He has been most caring during the entire course of this research and literally gave me a free pass to his reservoir of knowledge and experience. He has been my guide since my M. Phil. days and this long association with him has been extremely fruitful not just as a scholar but also as a person. Apart from being a great guide, I have always found him to be a great human being.

I also owe a great deal to my other teachers for their unfailing contributions to this research. Most of my insights into the Iranian politics have been the result of the teachings of Prof. Gulshan Dietl. Apart from an expert on the Iranian studies, she has always been an affectionate teacher. It was Prof. Girijesh Pant who emphasised the importance of power struggle in the Iranian politics and encouraged me to focus on this aspect. Prof. A. K. Pasha provided me useful insights into the history of Iran and other countries of West Asia. Some of the important questions raised by Prof. P. R. Kumaraswamy in the final stage of my research have worked towards enriching the thesis. To all these teachers my indebtedness knows no bounds.

I wish to make a special mention of a genius in his own right whom I call Biplab Sir. The skills of effective reading that I learnt from him helped me immensely while sifting important facts from seemingly infinite pages of research materials. Such skills expedited the research process without compromising with its comprehensiveness. While facts and ideas play important role during the course of the research, their effective presentation becomes vital at the stage of writing the thesis. The training imparted by Priya and Swapna on the art of writing proved most helpful at this stage. I humbly submit my deepest gratitude to these great people.

I wish to thank my fellow scholars and friends Kundan and Prashant for patiently tolerating me during the entire course of research. The way I reduced them into my captive audiences for listening to my ideas on a continuous basis and refining them through discussions, even I sometimes used to feel pity for them. I owe a separate debt of thanks to my Iranian friend Masood for helping me with all his resources. Other friends including Chaitanya, Jaffar, Rakesh and Siraj have also helped me in various ways to ensure my smooth sailing with the research. Indeed these friends have been my greatest earnings over the years.

I feel the greatest pleasure to thank my mother, my sister and my brothers for their love and warmth and for always believing in me. I also thank my sister-in-law Zeba for her help and understanding. My greatest thanks, however, goes to my God who has enriched my life with so many good people.
