ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I am grateful to Professors I. Qadeer and D. Banerji for providing me an opportunity to work in a caring and intellectually rich environment at the Center for Social Medicine and Community Health, School of Social Sciences at the Jawaharlal Nehru University.

It is from them I learnt, that to create what must be, one has to question what is. As a clinician I was used to thinking of disease as an end in itself. They made me perceive that disease cannot be understood in isolation from its environment or the socioeconomic context in which it is located.

They were helpful to me in their own unique ways, in critically examining the assumptions and strategies of the diarrhoeal disease control programme, in identifying key questions, in planning and implementing the study and in understanding the meaning of all that I observed in the perspective of social sciences. At the end of this experience I feel a relatively more complete physician.

I am grateful to the other faculty members and colleagues at the department for their constructive criticism and suggestions.

I owe thanks to all my personal friends for extending full cooperation, support and for their contributions great or small during different phases of the study.

Above all, I am grateful to my family for bearing with my long absences and late hours during the last few years and for their continued support without which this work would have never been completed.
