This thesis would not have been possible without the continuing support of my supervisor Dr. N. Shantha Mohan. From her I have learnt not only how to create an argument, but also when to gracefully lose one. She stands as an exemplar of academic probity and nurture. Dr. K. Kasturirangan and Dr. V.S. Ramamurthy have chaired my doctoral committee during different periods of time. Their support and kindness has been invaluable.

The various members of my doctoral committee (past and present) have given me unstinting support and encouragement. Dr. K.V. Aiahanna, Dr. Narendar Pani, Dr. P.K. Shetty, Dr. Sundar Sarukkai, and Dr. A R Vasavi have been members of my doctoral committee at various periods of time, and their contribution to my learning has been invaluable. The academic community at National Institute of Advanced Studies consisting of other doctoral students, faculty and postdoctoral fellows has made this thesis richer by its constant engagement and interrogation of my work. NIAS has been an ideal institution to conduct doctoral research in because of the space and freedom it has provided to pursue my interests. The staff at NIAS has been a source of inspiration by their quirky combination of professionalism and affection. I cannot thank them enough.

This is a study of emergent forms of governmental action in Kalahandi, Odisha. It has benefited immensely from the support of villagers in Kalahandi and governmental staff of the various village-level microwatershed development committees, block-level Project Implementing Agencies, District Watershed Mission, Kalahandi and Orissa Watershed Development Mission. Because of reasons of research confidentiality they cannot be named. But without their generosity this thesis would not have been possible. Hope many of them will find themselves and their stories on these pages and not flinch at the academic context in which these have been put.

My family, like that of most doctoral students, has been long-suffering and indulgent of my work. I hope it finds in this thesis some compensation for the sacrifices it has made on my behalf. My friends, especially the ‘non-academic’ ones have helped by just being there and caring for me, and by being always concerned about my work.

Doctoral research is supposed to be lonely work, but for me it has involved finding friends, both in the field and in the wider academic community.

Thanks, to you all; this thesis is as much yours as it is mine.
