ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

"No man is an island" is quite an appropriate observation. In the present context it is suggestive. A thesis may seem to be a mere thesis to the common eye, but to its writer it is much more; he only knows how is it made. His own labour - the pains of labour, others active cooperation, financial assistance and material aid, and what not, are involved in giving it a shape. He particularly recalls, with gratitude, the immense cooperation he receives from all quarters in completing the research project. It is my humble duty, therefore, to express thankfulness to those who were of help in the preparation of the thesis.

Of all, I feel elated in acknowledging the debt of Max Beerbohm, the author, whose works have all the while been the source of pleasure and inspiration in my critical study of his writings. They have instilled in me thoughtfulness and a sense of appreciation of language - its delicacy and sensitivity; and the less grateful I feel myself to the scholars whose critical works served for guide lines in estimating Beerbohm's art.

First and foremost, the words of deep gratitude and obligation I humbly reserve for my worthy teacher and supervisor Dr. J.S. Misra, who has not only given me personal attention, but has taken utmost pains in getting the draft of the thesis prepared, and it is his unflinching and scholarly guidance, I am sure, that gives it the form.

I acknowledge Professor Mohan Lal, M.A., Ph.D. (Wales), the Head, Department of English, as my patron, whose scholarly and humanitarian approach to things inspired me all the while in this literary pursuit. I deeply owe to Professor S. Mallikarjunan, M.A., Ph.D., who is actually my main source of inspiration in taking up this research project. I sincerely thank the Department of English, as a whole, for providing me a very congenial and friendly atmosphere during my period of stay there as a 'teacher fellow'.

I can't repay the debt of Dr. V.D. Jha, Assistant Professor, and Shri Ramesh Jain of Ancient Indian History, Culture and Archaeology Department, University of Saugar, who have supported me throughout the enervating moments during the finalisation process of the thesis.

For material help, I feel highly indebted to Mrs. M.H. Bodi, the Reference Librarian of The British Council Library, Delhi, without whose active support I could not have obtained the rare articles and books from abroad, needed for this research work. Not the least am I thankful to the Librarians of University of Saugar, Delhi University, The National Library, Calcutta, who have readily extended material help for my work.
I sincerely thank University Grants Commission, Delhi, and the Education Department, Government of Madhya Pradesh, Bhopal, for providing me the financial assistance and academic leave, enabling me thus to complete the research project.

I am thankful to Shri G.P. Rai and Shri P.S. Mishra who have managed the typing work of the thesis efficiently. I deeply appreciate Shri Rai for taking up the work at a critical moment and finishing it within a short time.

Lastly, the thanks are reserved for the members of my family who have patiently put up with my eccentricities during the trying period of this research work.
