ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This research work has been accomplished under the able guidance of Dr. Ranjit Singh Ghuman, former Professor and Head of the Department of Economics, Punjabi University and presently Professor Nehru SAIL Chair at the Centre for Research in Rural and Industrial Development (CRRID), Chandigarh. I profoundly express my gratitude to him for his ever-willing help at every step. When my official responsibilities and obligations used to pin me down, bringing the whole endeavour to a stand still, he always encouraged me with a beaming smile to keep it going. I have absolutely no doubt that without his consistent encouragement and keen supervision this work would not have seen the light of the day. My heartfelt thanks are also due to Mrs. Updesh Kaur Ghuman, who warm-heartedly facilitated my endless meetings and discussions with Dr. Ghuman at their residence.

I am grateful to Professor Sucha Singh Gill, former Dean Academics at the Punjabi University and presently Director General, CRRID, Chandigarh for a couple of meaningful discussions on various aspects of the theme. Professor R. K. Bansal, Head, Department of Economics, also deserves my thanks for his administrative cooperation. I am also thankful to Professor Inderjeet Singh, Professor Sukhwinder Singh, Professor Lakhwinder Singh Gill, Professor K.S. Bhangoo and Professor J.S.Brar, all distinguished teachers and researchers at Punjabi University, for their valuable suggestions during the annual seminars. I am especially obliged to Professor Sukhwinder Singh, who was kind enough to spare his valuable time for a thorough reading of the draft and several valuable suggestions.

This research work involved a mammoth task of gathering primary data from all households belonging to 24 villages scattered and spread along the length and breadth of the state of Punjab. A number of persons helped me in this process of data collection. Foremost among them is my friend and an erstwhile colleague in the Department of Local-self Government of Punjab, Mr. Jagdish Johal, who, in spite of his own grueling official routine, willingly spared time for me to visit each of these villages. Mr. Tarsem Sharma, Naib-Tehsildar in Punjab’s Revenue Department, Mr. Jagdish Lehra, Mr. Jagsher Poohli and Mr. Gurpreet (Research Fellow at Punjabi University’s Department of Economics) were some of the other prominent members of the team. All of us visited these villages, collected the required data during the day-time and stayed together at hither to unknown places. Not even once they did show a slightest hesitation in accompanying me. Rather, their own sense of commitment towards the betterment of rural masses of the state has made the whole exercise - repeatedly asking the same set of questions to each household head - a lively and joyful engagement. Their commitment and hard work rekindle my faith that the state, her officials and many selfless but meaningful people still can do many positive things for rural masses lagging behind in every sphere of life. My thanks are also to Sarpanches, Panches and Lamberdars of these villages who not only introduced us to the households, but opened their houses and hearts to make us feel comfortable.

I am grateful to Mr. Sanjiv Sharma, Head of the office of National Informatics Centre at Patiala and his team for getting me trained and helping me to feed the raw data to the computer and its tabulation. Dr. Sukhpal, Senior Economist, Department of Economics and Sociology, Punjab Agriculture University, Ludhiana, helped me a lot in this process. Discussions with him resulted not only in recasting of few significant processes, but also in shaping many of the arguments put in the work. Mr. Jaspreet Singh, my former colleague in the Office of Deputy Commissioner, Patiala deserves my appreciation for setting the first draft. I thank him from the core of my heart. Thanks are also due to Mr. Baltej Bhattal for final layout of thesis.

I am indebted to Dr. Kulwinder Singh, my very dear friend working as an Assistant Professor of Library & Information Science in the Department of Distance Education, Punjabi University, for consistently committing me to do the present research work. He was a source of constant encouragement – reminding me the due dates of filing the mandatory progress reports - and doer of the odd jobs concerning this work.
