I think, without contribution of others, it is impossible to complete a PhD Thesis. This thesis is also a result of combination of my hard efforts and contribution of many individuals and institutions. The most important contribution was made by Professor Onkar Prasad of the Visva Bharati University. I am indebted to him for his supervision, guidance and encouragement during the course of this thesis. I am indebted to Ben Rogaly of the University of Sussex, United Kingdom. He continuously pursued me to do my PhD since when I expressed my interest to him in this regard. His other important contributions include the permission to combine my fieldwork and data analysis with his research project I was working for; occasional suggestion and continuous encouragement to carry on my research; and making opportunity for me to visit his university that allowed me to utilize a broad range of resources available there. I am thankful to Manabi Majumdar of the Centre for Studies in Social Sciences, Calcutta, for her encouragement and suggestion that was useful to this thesis. I am thankful to Manas Ray, Head of the Department of Anthropology for his kind cooperation with regard to official matters. I am grateful to many staff of libraries in Visva Bharati, particularly the Central Library, Library of Vinay Bhavana, Library of Palli Samgathana Vibhaga, and the Library of Palli Siksha Bhavana. I am grateful to Satyabrata Chakrabarti, a former Deputy Director of Anthropological Survey of India, Kolkata.

Many thanks for Deeptima Massey, who was my colleague when I was working with the project of Ben Rogaly. She extended help to me to her best, which was beyond the relationship between colleagues. She helped in many ways such as finding and sending articles to me from the UK. There were many well wishers who sincerely wanted me to complete my PhD. The space does not allow to name all of them but I would like to mention the names of Mozammel Haque, Nur Islam and Subhrangshu Santra.

I am grateful to the villagers particularly those who shared their life experiences, time, food, and homes with me and without whom this research would never have been possible. I have been enriched by the friendliness, openness, and particularly by their hospitality.

I am also grateful to my wife, Salima Begam, and my sons, Mohammad and Ahammad Mustafa, who sacrificed my company without which I could not complete this thesis.
