The writing of this essay has been a transformative experience. It was through conversations with Achyut Yagnik that I acquired my initial understanding about 19th century Gujarat. Achyutbhai has a unique way of posing problems, of exciting the imagination. He, like a fine teacher also knows which part of the journey needs to be walked together. Achyutbhai, thank you. I owe you a cup of tea!

It was with a great sense of hesitation that I requested Ashis Nandy to supervise this work. I was surprised at his ‘Yes.’ I should not have been. Ashis Nandy has been very generous and very patient. He has allowed me to pose my questions, has encouraged me to find my method and my answers. The process has not been easy, he has dealt with my silence and disappearance with remarkable generosity. This warmth and generosity has allowed me to go back to him time and again and have conversations. I am grateful for this.

During my brief stay in Delhi, I formed one of the most enduring relationships of my life. Suresh and Deepa Sharma have given me warmth, care and affection. Conversations with Suresh ‘Sahib’ have always been grand. Suresh to me represents a sensitivity and sensibility that is rare. Conversations in the quiet warmth of Deepa and Suresh’s house in Delhi and Shimla will always be a memory to cherish. I am also glad that is not only a memory but also a continuing dialogue. Thank you.

Ganesh Devy is my teacher. His concern has been to enable me to be a good person. From the time we spent trying to work in the drought affected areas of Savali taluka, to his recent involvement with the questions of tribal identities and the rights of the denotified communities he has taught me take academic desires not too seriously. But he also allows me to speak about "work." This essay has benefited by his detailed comments. I am indebted. Seriously!

Udaya Kumar with his deep scholarship and warmth commented upon the chapters on Govardhanram and Manibhai. Udaya would like if this essay represented a deeper philosophical reflection. But he also knows that some things are not available to everyone. This essay owes much to his efforts.

Prabodh Parikh is a poet, a painter and a philosopher. He has an ability of a poet, a painter and a philosopher to suggest, and to allude. He differs with generosity. Prabodhbhai thank you.

Punam Zutshi has a rare ability to enter the work of her friends and make it her own. Her care, concern and scholarship have informed this work. She ensured that I continued to work when it was most difficult to do so. I wish I could have reciprocated. But I also know it was a gift, I accept it. Punam thanks very much.

Meenakshi Mukherjee commented on the section on Govardhanram. She also told me that a thesis was like Draupadi's saree - never ending! Thank you Meenakshidi.

The early part of this work was done at the Centre for the Study of developing Societies, Delhi. I also had the opportunity to spend three months at the Inter-University Centre for Humanities and Social Sciences at the Indian Institute of Advanced Studies, Shimla. I am grateful to both these organisations. A large part of this work was done at the National Institute of Design, Ahmedabad. NID articulates through form, colour, images and textures. But it also has space for words. This space was guarded by some of us zealously. Vikas Satwalekar, the former Executive Director of NID allowed us this privilege. It was a caring institutional act. Thank You.

S. Sethuraman was perhaps the only one at NID apart from Punam who knew what I was up to. Sethu has a rare ability to give, including our post lunch radicalism! Sreekumari Pillai, Uma Chandran and Manoj Nair have typed the various drafts of my writing, thank you. For Amit Kharsani absence of images in a lay out is hard to deal with. Even so he ensured that this essay does not go out without a touch of 'design.' Thank you.
My friend Binita will protest about her inclusion in this ritual. Bini has to be often reminded of what she contributes, means and also that she is a fine intellectual. It has been a friendship which sustains and nourishes. Heartfelt thanks.

Megha would have been a more 'proper' student of literature but for her fascination with law. The ten years with her have been joyous. She has suffered the most my real and imagined difficulties with writing. She has touchingly borne the burden. Megha has allowed me to retreat for long periods, assuring at the same time that she was around if I wanted to speak. I value her camaraderie. But for Katayani this might have been over earlier. Katya has made me a better story teller!

Taralika and Suhrud have been wonderful parents. It was they who gave me Sarasvatichandra at the age of eleven. They gave me the flavour of language, literature and politics. They have allowed me to drift and be my own person. I hope the dedication can capture something of what I wish to express. This essay is for Taralika and Suhrud.
