ABSTRACT

The level of agricultural output in North-Eastern Region, specially the hilly areas of the Region, is significantly low as compared to the most of the other regions of the country. Moreover, the agricultural production among different states of the region also varies in a considerable degree.

As the bulk of the population in this region is rural in character, any attempt to develop the economy of this region must be directed towards agricultural development.

In the present analysis an attempt has been made to find out the growth rates of agricultural output and also to assess the level of agricultural development in the North-Eastern Region.
