ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

First and foremost, I am indebted to late Professor D.M. Desai, ex-Dean of the Faculty of Education and Psychology of M.S. University of Baroda, who approved the present thesis in the year 1977, when I went to Baroda. After some time, I was terribly shocked and taken aback on receiving the sad news in my home country, Mauritius, that the Professor suddenly passed away. Thereafter, I wondered whether I could possibly continue to write this thesis without his guidance.

I must say that I am extremely grateful to Professor D.B. Desai who, after informing me officially of the sad demise of the ex-Dean and my ex-Guide, appointed Professor P.K. Dongre, a talented educational philosopher, as my new Guide who had regular correspondence with me, besides the usual academic research dialogue between him and me.

I am actually very much indebted to my present guide, Professor P.K. Dongre, who encouraged me to continue to write this thesis and to submit all my research papers to him. I must confess that, without his worthwhile guidance, valuable help and timely assistance, it would have been impossible for me to complete this thesis.

I am also thankful to Professor R.P. Bhatnagar, Dean of the Faculty of Education and Psychology of Meerut University, who, while acting as an Advisor to the Mauritius Institute of Education from April 1980 to November 1980, cast a glance on my work every now and then, gave me his encouragement and also wrote a report to Professor P.K. Dongre on the research done by me.
My thanks also go to Mrs Kalyani Mulloo and Miss Sarita Jankee, secretaries in the Department of Education Studies at the Mauritius Institute of Education, who did the typing and collated the whole work in my presence.
