Acknowledgement

This research is the outcome of continuous help, and encouragement of few persons one of whom is my supervisor Prof. Dr. Rani Hazarika Kakati. Her guidance during the preparation of the thesis, and the untiring labour she took in examining the draft, is invaluable and rare example. I express my sincere gratitude to her. I feel it necessary to recall the help offered to me my Prof. Dr. Indrani Dutta, Director OKDISCD who apart from the academic guidance, made all complex official formalities associated with my fellowship easier for me. Her kindness worked as spirit behind this thesis. I am also thankful to Dr. A.N.S. Ahmed and Dr Bhupen Sarmah of OKDISCD both of whom have showered their affectionate authority on me by reminding me about my task whenever I loosened the pace. Their affection was refreshing amidst this tiring research work, which always helped me to go down to work again.

I wish to extend my sincere thanks to Dr. Upala Barua, Senior Lecturer in Anthropology, Cotton College, who has done ample work on the plain's Karbis, for the guidance, the stimulating discussions, the books, and help at all stages of this research that I gained. I am deeply grateful to ICSSR and OKDISCD for providing the financial support through the Institutional Ph.D. Junior Research Fellowship. To Omeo Kumar Das Institute of Social Change and Development I extend my special thanks also for the administrative and academic support, and the friendly support of the entire staff. For the much valuable library resource, I am indebted to the Gauhati University Library, the Assam Administrative Staff College library, OKDISCD library, Naba Kanta Baruah Foundation Library, The Assam Institute of Research for Tribals and Scheduled Castes, the Australian National University, Canberra and the Universiteit van Amsterdam. My special thanks to the Department of Anthropology, Gauhati University for the academic and administrative support.

I am also indebted to Prof Nicolas Peterson, the Dean of ANU College of Arts and Social Sciences for the valuable tutorials and academic discussions that added important dimensions to my research, also for arranging my visit to the Australian National University, for providing me all assistance and support in conducting my library works, and the books he had kindly presented me. To Prof. Patrick Guinness and Dr. Chris Gregory of the School of Archaeology and Anthropology, ANU my gratitude is extended for the discussions, references and books they lent me. In this regard I am indebted to ICSSR for ensuring my sponsorship for my visit to ANU and to the Government of the Netherlands for sponsoring my visit to the Universiteit van Amsterdam.

My deep thanks to my family for all the support and assistance. Earnest thanks to my nieces Eesha, Driti, Anisha and my nephew Armin for the inspiration that they have constantly been for me and for invigorating me. I am deeply indebted to Mr. Udayan Hazarika, who with his research experience, all along helped me in putting myself in right track of the research and for making possible this research work. I also owe my thanks to Sri Dhireswar Rohang of Rongkimi village who helped me.

Finally I must express my thanks to the warm, affectionate and simple villagers for their co-operation, friendliness that has illuminated me and made this study an enriching experience. Without their assistance this research would not have seen this day.
