ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

It is my pleasant duty to express my thanks and gratitude to my revered teacher Prof. B. C. Kar, M.A., B.T., M.A. (Education), T.D. (London), University Professor and the Head of the Department of Education and B.T. of the Gauhati University, for his valuable guidance throughout these years in writing this thesis. His affection and encouragement took me to the Institute of Education of the University of London in 1968 with one of the two coveted Imperial Relations Trust Fellowships awarded to me on an all-India competition.

During my stay in the Institute of Education of the University of London, I received every help from my tutor Mr. D. J. Johnston, Adviser to Teachers of that Institute, in studying the teacher training process of England through visits to different educational institutions, contacts, discussion and study which helped me in the successful completion of the Associateship course of the University of London and in writing this thesis. I thank him again.
I thank the authorities of all the educational institutions I visited in India and abroad in connection with this study. I am happy to recall that these authorities made me feel as if my visit to their institutions was more important for them than for me.

I also owe a debt of gratitude to the Principals of the Training Colleges of Assam and to all those who helped me in the completion of this work.

S. Saikia,
Lecturer in Education and B.T.,
Gauhati University.
1971