Acknowledgments

This research work was only possible thanks to the many people who have helped it and supported it in many different ways. First of all, I would like to thank my supervisor at Mysore University, Professor M. V. Krishnappa, for his advice, his understanding and for the freedom he allowed me to explore very different areas of research without fearing that I would have never come back to the topic of my thesis. I am aware that such freedom is a rare encounter for a Ph.D. student and I am thankful for it.

As I enrolled in Mysore University I was honoured to be assigned to the Department of Ancient History and Archaeology where many illustrious scholars have studied and taught. My grateful thanks go to all the department professors, the Chairman, to the research fellows, to my Ph.D. colleagues and to the students for having welcomed me and made me part of this prestigious family. Amongst the department staff, Mrs. Usha deserves a special mention for her resourcefulness and patience in taking me through the sometimes hard journey into Indian bureaucracy.

My research was financially supported by a scholarship of the Indian Council for Cultural Relations. My heartfelt thanks go in particular to Mr. Venugopal of the ICCR Bangalore for having been a constant and wise advisor during my years in India. His kindness, humanity and his love for his work will always stand as an example for me. As a foreigner student in India, I have also found a huge amount of help and efficiency amongst the staff of the International Centre, University of Mysore, and especially in the person of its Director, Dr. R. Indira.

The decision to do my Ph.D. in India was a natural and yet not an easy one. I would like here to express all my gratitude to Professor Gian Giuseppe Filippi of the University of Venice not only for having been the first to disclose to me the wonder that is Indian art, but also for having strongly encouraged me to pursue my research in India. To his love for Hindu Tradition and to his idiosyncrasy for the “so called indologists who never go to India”, I owe a deep debt of gratitude.
The late Dr. M. S. Nagaraja Rao, retired Director of the Archaeological Survey of India, was my first contact in Mysore and the most precious one. Simply, I owe to him everything that happened to me in India, the most interesting discoveries and the most resourceful encounters. Thanks to his enthusiasm, his love for knowledge and his unconditional support for my research, my life in India has always been easy, peaceful, interesting and quite perfect. When I first arrived in India, I expressed to Dr. Rao the desire to study Sanskrit in a traditional atmosphere. Since then Dr. M. A. Jayashree has entered into my life and still is part of it. I will never forget the generosity with which she and her wonderful family welcomed me, taught me, advised me, consoled me and fed me during all these years. To all of them, who offered me a real home far from home, goes all my gratitude and affection.

My approach to the traditional scriptures was done under the strict guidance of Śrī M. A. Lakshmithathachar, a great scholar and a true teacher, a rare encounter, especially these days. Not only did he accept me as his student, but in fact he allowed me to become a member of his household where I have received the most precious gifts, above all the gift of knowledge, without having been asked for anything in return. With immense compassion he trained me in Sanskrit and in the śāstras leaving me incomparably richer then he found me. The time I have spent in Melkote with him and his beloved wife Goda, to whom this thesis is dedicated, are the most cherished memories of my days in India, a blessing I am carrying with me still today. My gratitude to Professor and to his wife, to Alwar and Ananth, their sons, and to Vidya, their daughter-in-law, is beyond what can be expressed with words.

For having accepted to read with me chapters 1 and 4 of Abhinavabhāratī I am thankful to Professor H. V. Nagaraja Rao, whose immense scholarship is equal only to this humbleness and kindness. Many other scholars helped me and discussed with me different aspects of my research. Amongst them, I would like to mention at least: Cristina Bignami, who lent me some of her photos of the Apsarases in the Belur temple, Tony Evensen, who organized the most resourceful and sometimes adventurous field trips, Daniele Cuneo and Elisa Ganser, with whom I had precious discussions on the Nātyaśāstra and on the Abhinavabhāratī and Gianni Pellegrini, Giorgia Rastelli, Rekha Rao, Anita Ratnam, Sharada Srinivasan, Padma Subrahmaniam, Anna-Pya Sjödin. I also want to specially thank Evelina Laviano for her priceless work in editing the photographic section of this thesis and James Boag for his precious advice on my English.

Apart from my research, some people became particularly dear to me as they made me feel loved and welcomed during my staying in India: Nagaraja, Sudha, their family and all the neighbours in Vagdevinagar, Rajendra, Padma and their children, Sri Kannan and Sri Priya, Sudhir and Asha Vombatkere, Ranjini and her family, Marc and Pascale Laisney, Sheila Baker, Saeideh Saeidi, Arezoo and Mehernaz Sadaat. To all of them goes my gratitude and affection. Last but not least, I want to thank my parents and my brother, my solid pillars, and finally my husband and my son, the centre around which everything else revolves.
