When I cast a glance over my shoulder at the work done, what strikes me most in this modest piece of academic research is the wide range of learning experiences it has provided. When this project was first conceived in the presence of Rangu and Mohanraj, I perceived it as a challenge and a lesson in conducting research in difficult circumstances. I feel happy I took it up and have finally been able to complete it.

I feel grateful to a number of persons who were always available for consultation and help.

In Jain Sahab I found a vigilant supervisor whose critical (and yet encouraging) comments on all the interim reports and draft versions led me to closely examine the issues and better understand the process of educational research; in Rangnayaki Srinivas and Mohanraj, two colleagues who were willing to undertake an intellectual exercise and slog through all sorts of tasks in a friendly spirit; in the Principals, teachers of English, and pupils of class IX in the four schools where the experiment was conducted, partly compassionate and partly curious fellow beings who were willing to co-operate in the name of research; and in Dr Harbans Patel, Dr. B.A. Shah, Prof. M.D. Patel, and Prof. Adam Ghodiwala, friends who were ready to go out of their way as they took interest in my work and shared their insights with me.
