ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The completion of this research work has been no easy task but acknowledging all the support I received is an even more daunting task. The list provided below is therefore necessarily incomplete and selective. I would like to thank:

- My supervisor, Dr. Praveen Sharda for believing in me and giving me her full support. She made available the books I needed and introduced me to authorities on stylistics. Her remarks and careful proofreading made a difference to this work. She treated me as family and heartily welcomed all my late telephone calls. I will always remember her with gratitude.

- My dissertation examining committee, Professor Pushpinder Syal and Dr. Deepti Gupta, of the Department of English, Panjab University, for their professional advice and for their encouragement and support.

- Professor M. P. Jain for his unconditional support and cooperation. His comments and suggestions were very helpful to me.

- The department librarians for assisting me in locating and tracing books.

- The teachers at the Faculty of Arts, Taiz University, who responded to the questionnaires; the observers who attended the classroom try-out of the proposed approach; and the student participants who took part in the different stages of the field work.

- The Australian poet Mark O’Connor for encouraging me to work on his poem. It took only one email message to reach him and from then onward he was available all the time. I sent dozens of emails to other poets but I have not heard back from any.

- My wife, Thikra, for much more than I can remember. I owe her a great deal of gratitude. She had a tighter schedule than mine, working on her dissertation and taking good care of our family. Her comments and suggestions over meals and cups of tea enriched this dissertation in many ways. To our daughters, Malak and Noor, I owe an apology. I might have managed to cater to their every need and spend much time with them but I certainly failed to set a good example for them. I often stayed up until morning, changed meal times and skipped many breakfasts. These are bad habits I promise to unlearn from now onward.
• My Chandigarh friends for the good time we spent together. But of all the Indian, Iranian, Iraqi and Yemeni company I enjoyed during my stay in Chandigarh, I would like to single out for a special thank-you my Iraqi friend Abdulminam and Yemeni friends Mashhoor, Aleryani and Anwar. They all managed, in their own ways, to make my stay not only tolerable but also memorable. The outings we made, the lunches we shared, the cups of coffee on cold evenings are moments that will stick in my mind for a long time. We had our share of forgettable days but we did not let them come between us and break the many bonds that linked us.

• My other friends in India Anees Alabsi, Ali An-nuzaili, Fawaz Alabsi and Mustafa Abdul-Muhsen who showed no hesitation to get me the books and photocopy materials that I needed from the EFLU libraries at Hyderabad and Lucknow. Anees paid the photocopy and airmail charges. I would also like to offer a word of thanks to Gamil Alamrani, Arkansas University, and Waleed Mahdi, University of New Mexico, who sent me materials from the USA which I could not get in India.

• My sponsor, Taiz University. Besides granting me a study leave for six years, during which I did my master’s at CIEFL (renamed as EFLU) and PhD at Panjab University, Taiz University provided me with a stipend, air tickets, and yearly books allowance. I am heavily indebted to the university and to my beloved country, Yemen, and hope to be able to repay the debt.

All these people, and organizations, have helped to make this dissertation a better work than it would otherwise have been. Any shortcomings that remain are totally mine.
