ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This study has been made possible due to the generous award of scholarship by the Panjab University, soon after my obtaining the Masters Degree in Psychology. For this I am deeply indebted to the University authorities and ardently wish I could pay back to my alma mater by continued research in my subject into which this research scholarship initiated me.

These years of research on the present project have been indeed very exciting and stimulating to me. For not only did I come to identify the significant problems in my area of research, but also encountered alike problems which claim attention for research. Particularly in our developing country where very little research in social psychology has been conducted over the years and much less integrated with social processes and goals, it could be exciting to be ever engaged in research in social problems, particularly relevant to our country.

For this opportunity and for ungrudging and remarkably insightful guidance, I owe a debt of gratitude to my supervisor, Dr. (Mrs.) H.K. Nijhawan, Head, Department of Psychology, Panjab University, Chandigarh. Her keen professional interest in my work, with exacting standard of research have been of great avail to me.
both in my training as a researcher and in the shaping out of this thesis. I should think I am lucky to have come under the influence of very scholarly supervisor. I am also grateful to my colleague Mrs. Prem Verma for sparing her precious time for discussions with me and for making invaluable suggestions. For the students who cooperated with me as subjects for the study, I have fond remembrances, for their ready assistance. I owe them my heartiest thanks.

The whole burden of typing out this thesis fell on Mr. C.M. Mittal who in spite of his ill health managed to do the work fairly efficiently in a remarkably short time, for which I am most grateful to him.

PROMILA

Department of Psychology,
Panjab University,
Chandigarh.