I do not see the concept of the 'liberal' as being really adversary of government, but basically one of the cornerstones of maintaining a viable democratic society. At this point in our history, not just because of a post-Watergate attitude, there is, it seems to me, a renaissance in democratic thought, not just in the role of the 'liberal' but in terms of other moves as well.