ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This thesis was made possible through the contribution and generosity of many people, most of whom would be found mentioned in the bibliography. If I have inadvertently adopted or adapted where I should have asked for permission, I hope it would be excused as oversight or ignorance.

The basic thoughts to build the hypotheses for this thesis were provided by small industry executives at many levels and of many organisations with whom I have actively talked over a period of more than 17 years. Their willingness to share with me in more detailed and more structured fashion provided the material on which this study is based. I would like to express my warm appreciation of their having done so.

I should also like to express my thanks to several of my associates—my former colleagues in the Small Scale Industries Development Organisation, including those at the SIFT Institute, Hyderabad—and the present ones at NITIE for their having contributed generously of their time and information. Prof. J.S. Narasimha (Director, NITIE & Director, Indian Institute of Management, Bangalore) was of special help, since he gave me of his time and judgement, directly and indirectly, on many occasions during the course of this study; the motivation and environment provided by him deserve a special mention.
In a multiplicity of ways, my wife and child worked with me in carrying this project through. I could not have written this thesis without their unfailing support and more particularly unless they had repeatedly expressed their keen desire to see me achieve the doctoral degree. I must record special gratitude to one of my brothers (F.K) who has taken special interest in my progress all through my life, thereby providing me with much-needed motive-power to complete this work in hand, too.

I am proud of Mr. G.K. (who prefers to remain anonymous), whose editorial and secretarial help was of major assistance.

I leave to the last, my statement of the most important appreciation i.e. to Dr. I.N. Kapoor, my Guide and Supervisor for this thesis. T.N., I guess, is completing about 16 years' association with the Commerce and Business Administration Department of the Panjab University (and probably 12 years as Professor and Head of the Department), to bring up which to its present size and recognition, he could be almost singularly named as responsible for this achievement. In spite of being extremely busy with the usual university load of administration, teaching and consultancy, T.N. was willing to take on the burden of another doctoral candidate at a time when his workload in connection with activities of All India Management Association, CIBS and Chandigarh Management Association, etc. were particularly heavy. Nearly two dozen years ago, he helped me to learn about the importance and challenge of research. I appreciate his wise counsel, his keen sense for the individual requirements of growth, his ability to inspire in others a feeling that research in Business Administration is a pursuit of worth—and finally, his skill in helping me fill in these requisite areas. All along he was extremely kind and helpful and an extremely good guide that one would naturally aspire to look for. I am grateful for his having afforded me this opportunity of working with him.

KITIE KORDBEY-DOO 067
June 10, 1974

KEWAL K. MEHAN
Professor of Management &
Chairman (Consultancy Services)