ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

It would have been impossible for me to have undertaken an academic study of this nature, but for able guidance, encouragement and unrestricted advice of my guide, Prof. J.K. Sharma, Professor of Public Administration, Punjab University, Chandigarh. Prof. Sharma enlightened and guided me at every stage in the course of this study, particularly in collection, analysis and interpretation of the data, without which the study would not have been as objective as it is now. I owe a great deal to him.

The motivating force behind this study has been the elderly and learned counsel of Shri T.N. Chaturvedi, former Director IIPA and presently Comptroller and Auditor General of India, who not only inspired me to undertake a study of this type but also suggested relevant readings on the subject. I have no words to express my gratitude to Shri Chaturvedi for the encouragement given by him and for permission granted to me to undertake this study.

I owe special thanks to the staff of the Libraries of the Indian Institute of Public Administration, New Delhi, Punjab University, Chandigarh and National Archives, New Delhi for helping me with primary source material and making variety of publications, articles and reports available without loss of time as and when I needed the same.
A study of this nature needed accurate and variety of information in respect of the institutions involved in training programmes and other similar activities in respect of the civil services and particularly in respect of the Indian Administrative Service. For this, I must thank most sincerely the Heads and other officers of the training institutions referred to in this work and particularly the Director, Lal Bahadur Shastri Academy of Administration, Mussoorie, the Principal, Administrative Staff College, Hyderabad and the Director, Academy of Administration, Madhya Pradesh, Bhopal for enabling me to have the relevant data in respect of their institutions.

The study could not have been as it is but for kind advice and suggestions by Prof. S.R. Verma, Prof. Kuldeep Nathur, Prof. S.K. Goyal and Dr. O.P. Minocha of the Indian Institute of Public Administration, who, throughout my endeavour, inspired me to understand and analyse the data collected by interviewing concerned senior officers. I am sincerely grateful to them for their constructive criticism of my approach and making very useful suggestions infusing objectivity to the study. My sincere thanks to the officers in the Ministry of Personnel, Public Grievances and Pensions who very kindly spared time for me and provided valuable information during discussions and interview with them.

I am specially beholden to Professors Livingstone, R.F. Clarke and C. Fuller of the Department of Administrative Studies, University of Manchester for sparing some of their most valuable time in discussing with me some aspects of the synopsis of this study and helping me to understand various aspects of human resource development, during my stay in their department in 1982.

The study could not have at all been possible but for the detailed discussions with the officers (including retired officers), who have been or are involved in planning and implementing various training programmes for the officers of the Indian Administrative Service. I had the privilege of snatching very valuable time from such senior and busy officers for interviewing them and having a very free and frank interaction with them. It will be a long list to mention the names of all these officers. However, I express my sincere gratitude to all of them, who kindly spared their time for me and enriched my study by providing their views based on their experience, which formed a valuable data for the study.

I owe special thanks to a large number of officers in the Indian Administrative Service, who attended various training programmes in different institutions for answering to my questions and requirements in regard to this study in a very frank and friendly manner.

A study of this nature involves a lot of work by way of secretarial assistance. My thanks are due to Sarvashri N.C.S. Yadav, G.K. Anora, F.C. Kohli, Mrs. Shashi Thakral, and Shri V.K. Sharma for their tireless efforts.
