ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

I am grateful to my teacher Dr. A. B. Mukerji, Professor and Head, Department of Geography, Panjab University, Chandigarh for suggesting to me the highly interesting research topic and for supervising the Ph.D. thesis. This thesis, in all humility, is dedicated to him for his blessings, inspiring guidance, and constant encouragement. He has also been instrumental in arranging an adequate grant by the Indian Council of Social Science Research for the fieldwork and preparation of the thesis. I am equally thankful to Dr. K.D. Sharma, Lecturer, Geography Department, Panjab University, Chandigarh, for his valuable assistance in the fieldwork and in reading the manuscript. My sincere thanks are also due to Mr. Nikunj Johari for all his help. Further I am grateful to the revenue officers and their staff for permission and help in making use of the records available with them. The villagers were an inexhaustible source of information and the thesis owes its creation, to a large extent, to their generosity. Finally, my husband, Mr. K.K. Sharma has been a constant source of encouragement and moral and material support, for which expressing gratitude would be mere formality.
