Completion of this monograph owes a lot to my revered teacher and Supervisor Professor P. L. Mehra, Head of the Departments of History and Central Asian Studies, Panjab University. I am deeply indebted to him for suggesting the topic for my thesis and for having given me generously and unstintingly his time and attention for full five years. Despite the tremendous strain to which he was exposed during this period (because his own book - The McMahon Line and After - was in process), he read the script with utmost thoroughness and made useful suggestions in improving it.

I am indebted to Dr. A. B. Mukerjee, Reader in the Department of Geography, Panjab University. He has been very helpful in interpreting the topographical details of the trade routes from Survey of India Topographical Sheets and in preparing the maps of these routes. My thanks are also due to Professor G. S. Bhalla of the Department of Economics, Panjab University, for his careful scrutiny of the statistical figures of trade transactions and for making useful suggestions towards the improvement of the statistical charts.
I also owe a word of thanks to Professor G.J. Alder from Oxford University, London. When I met him at Chandigarh in 1974 he was trekking on the foot-steps of Moorcraft and was writing on latter's adventures in Ladakh. My discussion with him proved very useful and gave me much insight into the subject. I am also grateful to the traders' families of Hoshiarpur whose forefathers had been trading in Leh and Kashgar. The verbal information (because no written record of trade transactions during the period of my study is available) given by Shri D. N. Ohri, now settled in Chandigarh, and Lala Nathu Ram Gohail (99 years old), Sarpanch in Bassi Purani, District Hoshiarpur, really enhanced my understanding of the trade transactions of that period.

I shall be failing in my duty if I do not offer my thanks to the staff of National Archives of India, New Delhi, for helping me in locating the source material, and to Dr. Jagdish Sharma, Librarian, Panjab University and his efficient staff for helping me in locating some very rare books and journals, and for providing me with a peaceful corner in the Library which enabled me to work with full concentration.
By thanks are also due to Dr. J. N. Chopra, Lecturer in the Department of Ancient Indian History and Archaeology, Panjab University, for his useful suggestions towards the improvement of chapter first of this monograph, which deals with the Sino-Indian overland trade from ancient times to the advent of British East India Company.

I am also grateful to Major H. H. Malik (Htd.) for carefully reading the typescript and removing obscurities. In the end I thank Mr. C. P. Sarna for preparing the maps and Mr. R. L. Khullar for the laborious job of typing from a poorly prepared manuscript, both entirely to my satisfaction.
