Acknowledgements

Every thesis stands as a testimony, not just of the work and effort put in by the candidate in producing it, but also as a commemoration of the support, guidance and advice upon which it was built. This thesis is no different, and I have a lot of people to thank for their kindness and generosity in helping me see this thesis through.

I am sincerely grateful to my supervisor, Prof. Anitha Kurup, for giving me this opportunity and for standing by me all through the last five years. I am extremely grateful for the atmosphere of freedom and autonomy she has offered me, allowing me to pursue a subject close to my heart, and for allowing me to take the research in the direction I have wanted to. Most importantly, I am very grateful to her for providing me an intellectual environment in which I have been able to explore new ideas, learn from different quarters and thrive and grow to my fullest.

I am equally grateful to my doctoral advisory committee members – Prof. Shekar Seshadri, Dr. Shivali Tukdeo, Prof. Sundar Sarukkai, and Dr. Rajesh Kasturirangan - for the enormous amount of time, encouragement, and valuable guidance and personal support that they have each given me. From each of them I have learnt something unique and each of their contributions has added a different facet to the thesis. Prof. Shekhar Seshadri first introduced me to and invited me on a journey towards exploring alternatives to psychological therapies and interventions, teaching me about community-led practices of critical education that can be truly empowering. This new knowledge became the framework for my understanding of the life skills programmes reviewed in this thesis, and for me being able to critically differentiate between ‘participation as self-regulation and subjection’ and ‘participation as self-expression’. Prof. Sundar Sarukkai strengthened this ability to sieve out the former kinds of programmes from the later, by drawing me into philosophical debates on the nature and role of experience and learning. Dr. Shivali Tukdeo helped me add the critical element to the thesis by helping me frame these debates against a social context. Dr. Rajesh Kasturirangan strengthened my analysis by pushing me to find alternative explanations, instead of settling for easy ones, and helped me articulate my critique in the sharpest manner.

I am most deeply indebted to Prof. A.R.Vasavi for being a mentor and friend who has guided me not just with the limited view of this thesis, but more in keeping my future in mind. It is from her that I learnt the basics of Sociology and Sociology of Education, and more importantly, learnt the skills of reading and writing critically. With her I have had many discussions that have helped me develop and consolidate my ideas, and she has painstakingly gone over every draft that I have written, refining and strengthening it. I am inexpressibly grateful to her for all this and more.

I would also like to specially thank Prof. Carol Upadhya for her invaluable support through the five years, for the courses that she has offered, and her generosity with respect to her time, resources and networks that she has shared with me freely, and all of which have contributed to my growth. In addition, I would like to thank the past and present Directors of NIAS, Prof. V.S. Ramamurthy and Prof. Baldev Raj, and all the faculty of NIAS, for their encouragement, time and inputs on thesis that has helped me improve upon it. A special thanks to the members of the Foucault Reading Group – Madhuri Ramesh of Ashoka Trust for Research in Ecology and the Environment (ATREE), Dr.
Vasanthi Das of Srishti Institute of Art, Design and Technology and Rashmi M. (NIAS) for being compatriots in exploring the challenging works of Michel Foucault, and for the engaging discussions that have helped me develop my understanding of his works. My gratitude to Prof. T.S. Saraswathi too, for giving me the time to discuss my work, despite her advanced age and frail health, and for guiding me towards vital resources and people to further my work.

A big thanks to my colleagues and friends at NIAS, especially Rashmi M., for all the long conversations on not just work, but also life, many of which figure in one way or the other, in many of the arguments I make in the thesis. Thanks is due to many of my other friends also—Naresh Keerthi, Rolla Das, Sanam Roohi, Neesha Dutt, Priya Gupta, Chetan Singai, Anupama Bittianda, Savitha Suresh Babu, Krupa Rajangam, Indira Vijayasimha, Sowjanya Peddi and Lakshmi Kutchibotla, for not just the stimulating intellectual companionship over the years, but also for the emotional support that they have provided during the difficult times in past few years.

I also thank the NIAS administrative staff, especially Ms. J.N. Sandhya (who many a times has gone out of her way in to ensure a smooth journey for us students), for their untiring support over the five years. My sincere gratitude also to the library staff for their help with accessing the required resources; and the canteen staff for feeding and nourishing us with wholesome food as we struggled through coursework, fieldwork and thesis writing.

I finally want to thank my family that has been a pillar of strength and unconditional support, without whom this thesis would have just not been possible. I am very grateful to my in-laws for their kindness and thoughtfulness in ensuring that I could carry on with the demanding schedule of the Ph.D., undisturbed by domestic chores. I am also extremely grateful to my husband, Raja P.K., who has been the real driving force behind the PhD. His encouragement and willingness to engage in intellectual conversations about my work have been the guiding light on the darkest days. A special thanks to my parents and sister for being by my side always, and for constantly giving me the moral and emotional strength to see my dreams true. Thanks to amma also for so willingly taking up the task of copy-editing the thesis despite her demanding every day routine. Lastly, thanks to all my field informants who so willingly let me into their lives and allowed me to weave a story from their narratives. It is they who have given me the ‘stuff’ that this thesis is made of.
