Bathed in reverence I feel humbled awed at the benevolence of the almighty, God or divine (whatever you may call) to have charted my life egging me to a juncture where I was able to pen down this doctoral thesis. Not externalizing God and placing Him on some grand pedestal in heaven I rather see Him in every human working in marvellous ways to help out His children through various people. This stream of research and knowledge inspired by “Him” and channalized through me was joined by various tributaries to keep it running on course till its final immersion into the vast ocean of truth. The first and major tributary is Dr. Mrs. Sud my guide and mentor who through her interjection support and guidance was able to hedge and cement the banks of this effervescent and gushing-river thus giving shape and form to this thesis lacking which it may have gone asunder dissipating all its energy and never be able to reach its destination. Her countless hours, warmth and love enabled the thesis to gush forth and not run itself dry or run amuck. Then came the warm brook of my mother whose nutrient ennobling water helped me to collect myself during times of physical and mental exhaustion. My brother Pankaj is gushing scathing stream constantly kept me on my toes. He was able to spring forth the delitescent avenues of my intellect and personality so that this doctoral thesis becomes a major reflection of my self-actualization proclivities. My dear friend Anu provided her but of the stream by checking it out finally whether the banks and contents of this thesis were sound and correct. Not to forget the kindness offered by Mr. Sharma at the Old age home at Basantpur. Thus I offer my gratitude to him.

I sincerely hope that this stream of research emptying into the ‘sea of truth’ would provide opportunities for others to flourish along its banks and still others to use nurturant water.

Apart from all the mentioned names there are many people who have helped me during all this time. I take this an opportunity to reach this point in research.
