ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The idea for this thesis emerged when I was doing a project with CHRI (Commonwealth Human Rights Initiative) on prison reforms in the prisons of Karnataka. But more than the project, it is the prisoners and their unbearable living conditions which prompted me to study the nature of punishment. It would be pretentious on my part if I say ‘thanks’ to those prisoners who in their desperation, apart from pointing out at other problems of prison life, constantly referred to the problem of prison labour. It struck me, as I, inspired from my initial readings on the prison had a different understanding of prison labour. As a linguistic representation of my gratefulness to them is not possible, I dedicate this work to them with the hope that a better future is still possible.

This thesis is a result of relentless support of several people. I want to thank my supervisor Prof. K C Suri for the lengthy hours of conversation and his incisive comments on my study. He was always considerate and forthcoming in all matters relating to my work. He went out of his way to help me in getting additional financial support for study visits to the different archives. His constant encouragement and prompt responses to all my requests and questions helped me in completing my thesis in the stipulated time.

I take this opportunity to thank my doctoral committee members Dr. Sanjay Palshikar, Prof. Prakash C Sarangi and Dr. Manjari Katju for their useful comments and questions on my thesis, some of them which I would have otherwise neglected. I also thank Prof. Arun Kumar Patnaik for his willingness to share with me some of the works done in the area of political economy in a historical perspective. I thank Prof. Vasanthi Srinivasan for her useful insights on my work.

I am grateful to Dr. Sanjay Palshikar for introducing me to the Critical Studies in Politics (CSP) project. My discussion with him and other members of the project helped me immensely in fine-tuning my arguments in the thesis. I owe special thanks to Aditya Nigam and Nivedita Menon for their often pertinent comments on parts of my thesis. In the initial stage of my research, Prof. Ujjwal Kumar Singh provided me with references on some of the classic and authoritative works on punishment. I thank him for this.
I am grateful to the Centre for the Study of Developing Societies (CSDS) for awarding me the Doctoral Fellowship without which the current work would not have reached its conclusion smoothly. I thank the Charles Wallace Trust for the monetary grant which enabled me to access archival documents at the India Office Library, London.

I am extremely grateful to my friends for their continued support. I owe special thanks to Laxman, Pradnya, Rajesh and Sujana for helping me in various stages of thesis writing and taking time to do things for me during my absence on the campus. I thank Charvaak and Tarangini for their comradeship. No amount of gratitude would suffice here. I also thank Bapi for making life a little lighter with his never dying humour.

I want to thank my parents for simply trusting me and letting me be, despite the immense social pressure which would have otherwise terminated my formal education. Also, long ago, when my father managed to leave the tannery and instead do small calculations for the state, little had he realized what a big leap he had made in terms of his children’s future. I thank him for putting up that brave struggle, and of course to them too, who had to put up a much bigger struggle, to make such struggles possible. And to my imaginative and energetic mother whose immense potential, despite having a supportive husband, under some conventional norms were simply directed to household chores, she, almost like all our mothers, dreamt, and made it happen for her children. I thank her for teaching me how to remain socially sensitive despite trying individual circumstances which has benefitted me immensely and enriched the whole experience of my formal education.
