Acknowledgement

As my research for a PhD degree comes to a close, culminating in the writing of this thesis, it seems to me like completing a long and arduous journey on some unknown difficult terrain. In retrospect, I wonder if I could have accomplished this feat without the involvement, support and benevolence of many whose reference may not appear elsewhere in this dissertation. I owe to them much more than I can possibly express but as a humble gesture of appreciation and gratitude, it would be obligatory to put them on record. It is however needless to say that, although the credit is only partially mine, I am solely responsible for any error found in this thesis.

I owe a deep debt of gratitude to Professor B.N.Chattoraj for his kind guidance at various levels with his creative teaching and his keen interest in the topic, which was a constant source of encouragement to me in preparing this thesis and whose teaching helped me in sharpening my theoretical understanding of the problem. Despite his busy schedule he was always willing to give me time to discuss with me the questions I was grappling with. His knowledge and depth of understanding of Criminology and secondary data sources, was always an inspiration for a novice like me. My discussions with him gave me the courage to deal with large scale data sets which is central to this thesis. In fact, it would not have been possible for me to complete the work but his keen interest and personal care encouraged me to complete the work. Although over the years we have developed strong personal ties, his integrity is such that he never compromised on the professional front. In him I found that blend of sensitivity and firmness as a supervisor, which perfectly suited my requirements. I do not think I have the words to express my deep gratitude for him and it appears almost preposterous to thank him for what he has done for me.

I am immensely grateful to Ms. Meenakshi Sinha, my teacher who taught and explained the intricacies of Criminology. She had the wonderful ability to communicate extremely complicated issues with great clarity and simplicity. Discussions with her helped me immensely in understanding the strengths and limitations of this study, and helped me to get direction for further research as well as scope for improvement.
I gratefully acknowledge the assistance help and services rendered to me by the staff of JNU, NICFS, ICSSR, IDSA, JMI, D.U., BHU, IIT Delhi, Jiwaji University, Gwalior library for their kind cooperation.

My special thanks to my wife, Ria, in bringing this dissertation into the present shape. This thesis is dedicated to her who suffered my neglect, sometimes cheerfully and sometimes grudgingly during the preparation of this thesis without which her good wishes and words of encouragement might have remained only a pipe dream. Finally, during the preparation of this thesis my family members also provided me tremendous support and encouragement. It was their belief that I could accomplish this task which provided me the much needed moral support. I especially thank my father for he always showed keen interest in my research work and provided me with constant and useful feedback. I am also thankful to my mother for her unflinching support and her confidence in my abilities. I wish to thank my didi Mohuya and my brother-in-law Pintu da and my nephew Subham have always supported and their love and motivation keeps me going. Without their faith in my abilities a PhD would have never been possible. Their sheer kindness, love and affection meant a lot to me.

At the end of it, I would like to bear full responsibility for any errors in this study.

Date                                                                                                           Name

Place

.