ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

First of all, I thank Prof. H. S. Gill, a philosopher, my guide, and, as he in his ever cordiality prefers to call himself, my friend too, for having not just supervised my thesis but having nurtured me over the past six years. Something as formal as an ‘acknowledgement’ of his contribution to this thesis and ‘thanking’ him for it are too meagre a means to do any justice to either the role he has played in shaping my thoughts or the feelings I have for him. Constrained to express the inexpressible, I just hope words do communicate thoughts.

I thank all my teachers at St. Xavier’s College, Calcutta and the Centre of Linguistics and English, JNU, for having shown me what literature means, and having inspired and encouraged me all the while. I would also like to thank Mr. S. S. Rawat, Ms. Rita Dhall and Mr. Karam Chand, the office-staff at CLE, without whose tireless support and active co-operation this thesis would have definitely not been possible.

I thank all my colleagues and students at Gargi College, Kirorimal College and Ramjas College, Delhi, and Asutosh College, Calcutta—the four institutions where I have taught while conducting this research—for having sharpened my ideas and shown me my weak points. I also thank the authorities of these colleges for having given me the opportunity to teach and having materially sustained me for the past four years, while providing me with lovely experiences too.

I take this opportunity to especially thank something, without which this thesis would have actually never been written, my dear little computer, which has been my most intimate companion for the past couple of years and has never given me any trouble, never complained as I went on burdening it to the limits of even machine endurance, and composed, typed and formatted on it the whole of this lengthy thesis. I thank Nandan and his computer too, without which this thesis could not have been proof-read. I also thank A. P. Computers, Ber Sarai, New Delhi for having most painstakingly printed and bound the thesis.

I thank all my friends in JNU, with whom I have studied, played, fought, and generally had a gala time over the past six years. So many people have had the generosity to be friendly with me that I suppose even attempting to name all of them would be futile. Therefore, I would mention only my roommates down these years—Parthoda, Sanjib, Piyas, Debashis, Sounak and Rajdeep—who have directly been at the receiving end of my meannesses and borne it all smilingly. I would also thank four non-campus friends of mine—Saurabh, Tatada, Anuradha and Shubhro—without whom my stay in Delhi wouldn’t have been half as interesting.

Finally, I would love to thank the one person who means so much to me, who has done such a lot for me and promises to do even more, whose frown has helped me reformulate many of this thesis’s postulates and whose smile has made me retain many others, whose love and care has kept me alive during all these dreary months of study, study, study. Thank you, Simi.

New Delhi, July 1999

(SAUGATA BHADURI)