ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Completing this thesis has required long years of patience and work. In such an endeavour, my supervisor, Professor Utsa Patnaik, has helped me in more than one way. She has been a continuous guidance in clarification of concepts and empirical calculations. Throughout the years which passed by, she has shown tremendous tolerance and helped me correct a number of parts of the thesis. I would like to express my sincere thanks and gratitude for her guidance and help at critical junctures of my work, without which the thesis would not have attained its present form and substance. I am indebted to her.

I am grateful to Professor Prabhat Patnaik, who has been a great source of inspiration to many generations of students in general and to me in particular. My meetings with him, though short, have always given me the required courage and confidence to pull on.

I am indebted to a large number of peasants and agent-merchants of Purnia, north Bihar, whose names are difficult to be kept alive in memory by now after passing of more than one and half decades but whose cooperative attitude and tolerance of a stranger among them during the canvassing of the questionnaire and interview schedules remains fresh in my memory. I would also like to express my thanks to a number of staffs in the libraries of Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi and AN Sinha Institute, Patna, and staffs in the offices of the regulated market yards, Purnia, and the Bihar Agricultural Marketing Board, Patna, who has helped me gather the data and information.

Last but not the least, my wife and little daughter deserve my thanks, who would be happy to hear that I have finally submitted the thesis.
