The desire to do a PhD was implanted in me by my parents when I was in high school. Despite my parents being elementary (primary) school dropout, they always taught me how a PhD was everything that a person must desire in his life. After 30 years when this PhD is being produced, I am glad to know how they have changed that opinion. Yet, it’s their desire, their encouragement, and their constant support that has produced this dissertation (and its producer). I gratefully dedicate this work to my parents — Bimal Kole and Shibani Kole.

Coming to the actual production of this work, I owe a lot to my Supervisor, Prof. L.N. Satpati. I am grateful to Prof. Satpati for his careful advise, guidance and supervision throughout this whole project. I am certain, without his critical eye, constant feedback and comments on various drafts of the chapters, directed reading and research, this dissertation would not have come to this stage. Comments that I received from other committee members during the proposal development phase and in pre-PhD seminar, were highly useful to develop a sound dissertation project.

Outside of the academic circle, discussions with my former colleague-activists and NGO-professionals in India remained highly useful. The “thinking” about this dissertation actually came when I was working at the Population Foundation of India (PFI), New Delhi (India). Kumudha Aruldas, the then Joint Director and my former “boss,” Sharmila Ghosh-Niyogi, and A.A. Jayachandran at PFI, shared their intellectual strands with me, that later helped to think through a solid PhD proposal. The Executive Director of PFI, A.R. Nanda, and Prof. Saraswati Raju at the Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi provided their useful comments on Chapter 6. My interaction with Delhi Network of Positive People (DNP*), and people living with HIV/AIDS, some of whom I personally interviewed for an earlier research study published by MAMTA Health Institute (MHI) were highly useful. Outside of PFI, my interaction within the NGO-circle implementing major HIV/AIDS programs, such as, Sunil Mehra, the Executive Director of MHI (and my former employer), and Anjali Sakhuja and Iram Saeed, my colleagues at MHI, remained highly productive during the formative stage of this dissertation.

Words are too little to express how much I owe to my better-half, Mamta Panwar. She not only remained my former colleague at MHI where we both worked and implemented HIV/AIDS programs but also became a quick testing-site for my hypotheses and arguments. She has been a constant source of support and encouragement for me — providing me everything that I needed from sharing an intellectual space, critiquing my stance, to taking care of our child and cooking delicious dishes to get my mind going. My beloved little one, Shivam Kole, has been a constant source of inspiration and encouragement for me. Sharing the joy of parenthood, and engaging in “child’s play” with him made my tiring long-days both pleasurable and productive. Thank you Mamta; thank you Shivam — without your support I could not have achieved this.

My sincere apologies if I have missed anyone despite my best intention to include everyone.

Subirkumar Kole
