ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

Writing a doctoral thesis is indeed quite laborious. It requires immense focus and patience as a researcher is caught up in a maze of adequately espousing the grand ideas that seem to erupt sporadically in the mind. It is also a collective effort as such a project is impossible without help, support and guidance. Hence, I would like to extend my heartiest thanks to my supervisor Professor Asha Kuthari Chaudhuri for her constant guidance and support. I would like to thank her for letting me borrow a large number of books from her personal library that further saved me from incurring a huge price on research books. I would like to personally thank Professor Ranjit Kumar Dev Goswami for expanding the range of my research area and guiding me with his encyclopaedic knowledge of world literature. I also thank Professor Bibhash Choudhury for being a mentor and teaching me the art of time-management. I would like to express my sincere gratitude to Professor Nandana Dutta and Dr. Sanjeev Kumar Nath for introducing me to certain unknown areas of African culture and literature. I extend my thanks to Kulada Bhattacharjee who agreed to sit for a personal interview on my supervisor’s request and also for giving me a great deal of information on Wole Soyinka as a person with whom he had attended various lectures and theatre workshops organised by the British Council back in the 1960s. I would also like to acknowledge my sincere thanks to the entire faculty of English for giving me the much needed confidence to pursue my project.

On completion of my mandatory PhD course work, I felt the initial hiccups that normally afflict any researcher regarding the viability of the argument, the justification of the topic/object of study, the voluminous range of literary materials at his/her disposal and the need to maintain a review of literature and a working bibliography. But as time flew, I began to see the potential of my topic to evolve a new theory. I realised with grave concern the injustice I would have done to my research if I had remained confined only to textual criticism and interpretation. Being a researcher in African drama, I then shifted my attention from the scanty research materials on Africa theatre to performance studies which appeared to be a fascinating area of study on which I could plant my initial research hypothesis. The libraries are not adequate with research materials on African literature and I have had to mostly buy the primary and secondary texts online at a gargantuan price. But the computer lab in the department gave me ample opportunity of subscribing and downloading seminal essays by notable writers in the wink of an eye.

I would however like to acknowledge the help and support I received from the staff members of Krishna Kanta Handiqui Library, Gauhati University. I am also grateful to Jonathan Nongbri, Assistant Librarian of North Eastern Hill University (NEHU) Shillong, who took personal initiative in providing me all the necessary research materials relating to African literature. My visit to the library of Indian Institute of Technology (IIT, Guwahati) gave me easy access to many research materials which I could not afford to buy first hand. Moreover, I was lucky to get the books photocopied which till date have served me well. I would also like to thank my college teacher Mr. Chandan Buragohain for instilling the confidence at a time when frustration took an upper hand and I felt like quitting my research. I extend my gratitude to Professor Alexander Petranovik, University of Serbia and Barbara Prillinger from the University of Salzburg, Austria for sending me eBooks of certain books gone out of print via email. I would like to thank Professor Gayatri Chakraborty Spivak whom I fortunately met at an international seminar in The Sibsagar College, Sivasagar for advising me to reasonably use and apply theory in my research.

Last but not the least, I would like to thank my loving Ammajaan and Abbajaan for their patience and support, especially my mother whose constant nagging concern was to see at what pace my research work have progressed. This research would not have been complete without her timely surveillance. The void that came into my family after my father’s demise gave me the zeal, fortitude and enthusiasm to fulfil his dream with gusto. I would also like to thank my two sisters and brother in-laws for being there for me and encouraging me when life seemed dismal and unpromising.

And I also thank my four-year old nephew Aarman who in spite of being a tyke never touched my laptop which he considered sacred and termed as ‘the big black book’!
