The present study is unique as it compares antioxidant levels and autonomic functions among patients with depression and healthy normal individuals.

There was significant alteration in the antioxidant levels and autonomic functions in patients suffering from depression compared to normal individuals. Therefore the present study concludes that utility of biochemical parameters and autonomic functions plays an important role in diagnosis, treatment and monitoring of depressive patients.

This study provides baseline data for further research in this field.