ABSTRACT

The systematic efforts of planned social change in rural India for the last 33 years have made significant impact on the peasant society of India. Social inequalities have changed the patterns which have mirrored in the social stratification of rural social organization. Taking a cue from Andre Betelile the present paper highlights social inequality in peasant society in the perspective of changing patterns of social stratification of village Kaindha, Development Block Kalyanpur, District Kanpur, U.P.

Paper read on 26, 27 December 1980 at Third U.P. Sociological Conference, Lucknow University, Lucknow.
ABSTRACT

The present paper attempts to form a sociological perspective on communal tensions in India. This perspective highlights socio-psychological factors and group dynamics in the creation of communal tensions. Further, a model for the sociological analysis of communal tension is also envisaged in this paper.
The present paper deals with the problems of population and development and its resultant sociological implications. The dynamics of population growth involves the consideration of an imbalance in sex-ratio, birth rate, population control measures future projections etc. The present trends of population explosion have created not only a disparity in the role of economic growth and development but have also generated many sociological problems viz. Agitations, Violence, crime and other social pathologies. The main focus of the present paper is the indication of major sociological implications in the context of population and development.

ABSTRACT

Cooperation and conflict are the two basic modes of human interaction. The factions of the conflict groups, in rural as well as in urban societies, reflect the process of cooperation, competition and conflict in the ongoing societies. Every interstice of the social fabric is characterized by the coordinates of conflictual and cooperative actions. The fruits of the development are contended with by the opposing factions and hence provide a number of opportunities to the leadership to procure and distribute the benefits and the booties of the development. The present paper is an outline of the dynamics of factions and factional leadership in the activities of cooperation and integration to the community through the analysis of a model.

The paper is presented for publication in 'Cooperative Perspective: A Journal of Cooperative Management' published by Vaikunth Mehta National Institute of Cooperative Management PUNE 411016 (India).
