Acknowledgments

A doctoral thesis, though written by an individual, is the cumulative hopes and dreams of many. The journey was not a solitary one and those who accompanied me, whether the whole way or in parts are responsible for the fruition of this project. Words fall short in my expression of gratitude to all those who have seen me through this. On the top of this rather long list is my guide, Dr. Anindya Sinha, ‘Rana Da’, to most of us. The most honest admission for me would be that he is an inspiration and I hope that my career and personality can be in totem to that one day. It is not just in a capacity of the guide but as a friend and confidant that I am grateful to him. He has always been encouraging of my ideas and pursuits and therefore I am indebted to him for life. He has held my hand through a number of hurdles and his support has become a lifeline. As a young academic it is always inspiring to see someone who has a thirst for knowledge and constant learning and is yet humble about his own knowledge.

I do not think there have been enough times that I have thanked Dr. Indu K Murthy, one of my advisors (also a member of the student advisory committee (SAC)). She not only discussed my ideas but also read multiple drafts of my writing, right from the proposal building stage. She has been a rock in my constantly churning state of mind and work. It was also very heartening to have her recall anecdotes from her recent tryst with her own doctoral work. I am indebted to her for her constant support and will always cherish my time with her.

Dr. Shivali Tukdeo, also on the SAC and a comrade of ideas, was another pillar of strength. I have lost count of the number of tea-breaks that we took, sharing not only work but enriching conversations on various social issues. If not for her constant voice in my head to fight on, I may not have stepped forward and reached this stage of my doctorate. In a course like doctoral studies, it is crucial to have people like her around for moral and academic support. My gratitude to her is not measurable.
I also had a great pleasure of having supportive members of SAC, I am also deeply indebted to Dr. M Shivamurthy, head of the agricultural extension at GKVK for his readiness to look at my work and consistent feedback. He also helped me understand the field of agricultural extension which has been very instrumental in my work. Working together on the papers helped me build an academic career.

Apart from the SAC members, the academic heads in NIAS, at various points in time, have inspired me to hold on and finish the project. The first is Dr. Shivali Tukdeo, who helped shape the proposals of mine and my batchmates work, which was no easy task. Then there was Dr. T Gopi Rethinaraj who saw me through the toughest part of my work. I am greatly indebted to Dr. Sundar Sarukkai for his help with theoretical inputs that have shaped my thesis as it stands today. I appreciate the time he took out to advise me in the capacity of scientist and philosopher, effectively structuring my work in an interdisciplinary lens.

I am eternally grateful for a space like NIAS which allowed me to seek the help of its diverse faculty. Of them, I would like to name Dr. Kshitja Joshi, Dr. Carol Upadhya, Dr. Narendra Pani, Dr. MB Rajani, Dr. Hippu SK Nathan, Dr. Dilip Ahuja and Dr. P K Shetty, who have been instrumental in helping at various stages of the doctoral work.

I am grateful to Prof V S Ramamurthy, Late Prof Baldev Raj, and Prof Shailesh Nayak, the three directors of the NIAS during my tenure as a doctoral student, for their constant encouragement and for creating an environment conducive for research at the institute.

I would like to extend a special mention to two members of the NIAS community. The first Ms. J N Sandhya who was not only instrumental in helping me with bureaucratic hurdles that one may face during the course of doctoral work, but also for cheering me up, offering advice and always celebrating even my smallest achievements. Mr. Gajanana S Naik, who was ever smiling and helpful in whatever way possible for him, has made my time at the institute memorable. I am genuinely indebted to the administrative staff at NIAS, who, very efficiently took care of all the formal requirements for the innumerable official work that always appeared to slip my mind. Mr. P Srinivas Aithal, Mr. K Ramakrishna, Mr. A Devraju, Mr. Bhatt, Mr. Lalu who provided all necessary logistical support to me during my time at the institute. I am particularly grateful to them for facilitating fieldwork and international travel during my tenure. I am truly grateful to have access to a library of the caliber at NIAS. Ms. R Vijaylakshmi and Ms. Hamsa Kalyani were extremely cooperative in making the library accessible to me, and giving me permission to use library beyond the working hours, and I thank them for their kindness from the bottom of my heart.

In addition to those at NIAS, I would like to mention here, Dr. Ashley Tellis. Though not formally part of my academic committee, he has helped me in ways which are beyond common platitudes. He constantly mentored me, right from the beginning of the doctoral project, through his own personal and professional struggles. He has been a beacon of hope in many a time of distress, constantly egging me on to do my best. I admire his zest for life and constant faith in students.

In the early stages of my work, inputs from Dr. Alok Mukherjee at National Physics Laboratory, Dr. Himanshu Pathak at IARI, Dr. D.C. Upprety Emeritus IARI, Delhi were indeed valuable to help me structure my research. Additionally, Dr. Jean Dreze at Ranchi university who was kind enough to give me inputs on chapters at the later stage of doctoral work. Their feedback has been very valuable in helping me shape my doctoral research work. Colleagues and friends at the two summer school, at Brown University and Institute of Development Studies who provided new insights to my work, I am grateful to them. Special mention to Kakoli Di for inspiring me and Rana da to finish the thesis.

An important phase of any Doctoral project is fieldwork. Mine would not have been possible had it not been for the cooperation of families in each of the field sites. They were not only kind enough to host me in their homes, but also assisted me with work. I would like to mention some of the families here; Suresh Chandra Agarwal and family in Attara, Banda, who made all the necessary arrangements for field visits and a comfortable place to stay. Specifically, Ms. Ruchi Agarwal who was kind enough to visit various government departments on the field to aid in gathering secondary data required. I am also indebted to journalists at Khabar Lahriya (a Local newspaper run by women journalists) for giving me contacts for farmer unions. Similarly, Ms. Shashi Bala and Mr. Sushil Kumar who not only give me a home during my visit to Saharanpur but also helped in navigating the city.
Mr. Sushil Kumar, especially, as he was with me on the field at the point I had just recovered from a leg injury and walking long and rough distances was very hard. If I don’t mention Mr. Surya Naryan Tripathi, a farmer and Lawyer in Gorakhpur, it would be very unfair. He helped me navigate the hyper-masculinized city of Gorakhpur, even though he was not directly contributing to my work. He helped a complete stranger on the basis that there was some knowledge to be gained. Last but not least in this list is Mr. Aditya Poddar who was helpful in getting contacts in the field Kanpur.

No fieldwork can be complete without the willingness of the participants of the study. While we return from the field with narratives and stories which humble and enrich us with the knowledge that one can gain, the participants themselves gain nothing by the process. Often, the anxiety of participants was visible in a number of interviews that I had conducted. I would like to extend my sincerest gratitude to all the participants, many of those who were kind enough to not only provide information needed but also extend the hospitality of their homes.

Much of a doctoral project is spent in solitude, searching for cohesion and trying to get clarity. It isn’t always joyous but if one has family and friends it makes it better. I have been lucky to count the following people friends who became part of my chosen family on this journey. I wish to thank Sumitra who was much more to me than a colleague, constant pampering, endless discussions, and rants that she patiently listened to, have been the most cherished moments of my stay in Bangalore. Words fail me when I think of people like Vrujen and Bodhi, who were my family, strength, and motivation to continue work, especially for taking care of me during my accident, pampering me with love and inspiring creativity. Over the years spent in Bangalore, I have also acquired family in people like Mrinmayee and Tanya. They were especially great at making the mundane more interesting. The times spent looking at the tree outside Tanya’s house was my solace after a long day of work. I do not think I have ever expressed my gratitude to Anu, who was a lot more than just a friend, she was a beacon of hope in the darker days of Ph.D., showering love and care and helping me whenever needed. Prathiba and Praveena who cheered me up with movies, songs, and food when I needed it the most. Khizer, with his amazing jokes, could cheer me up on a really drab day. Devangana, Andre and Subhashini who were not just friends, but also critics of my work, I am eternally grateful to have them in my life. Vidya, Veena, Kishor and Tanya for opening up their home to during the last leg of the Ph.D., helping me when I needed a place to stay, their positivity and camaraderie that helped me through the difficult emotional times. Kishor was a pillar of strength who would often talk about the science fiction and shared utopia giving me wisdom on the mundane nature of Ph.D. Harpreet, Suvarna, and Gandhari constantly lending an ear to all my rants and often find humor in the drab moments of my Ph.D. As I make this list, I am so glad to have people like Aishwerya, Twishi, Abhaya, Aditi, Nikita, Karthika, Sahana, Manish, Aswin, Sabuj, Andy and many more who have helped in numerous ways. I will always cherish what I have shared with each one of them. At the same time, colleagues at NIAS, Soundrya, Priya, Rashmi, Nishant, Neesha, Surya, Nishant S, Vishwesh, Priya, Smriti who helped at various stages of my work, I would like to thank all of them. Humans play an important role in our lives, so do the other nature’s creations who even though do not communicate in the same language, often give one the wisdom which is rarely understood. I thank Lily, Teetree, and Kale for loving me unconditionally and making me feel belonged to a space.

Finally, I would like to thank my family. Specifically, my mother, who has been a huge support in this entire journey. It was from her that I drew inspiration, her faith in me helped me to be the first person from entire family to ever pursue a doctoral degree. She did everything a human being can possibly do to help, whether it be accompanying me to various field sites, or listening to me worry about the seemingly colossal task of finishing a doctoral thesis. She would constantly lift up my spirits and help me focus on my work.
She is an inspiration to me. I thank her for being there, and dedicate my thesis to her.

This work, my education thus far, and the ability to tread this path, would not have happened without the women who fought for liberation and right to education; I dedicate my efforts to the movement as well. Last, but not the least, all the feminists who fought for the rights of women to get an education.
