ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The thesis is the outcome of extensive research of four years during which a number of former career bureaucrats, diplomats, academia, analysts, serving and retired officers of the Indian Armed Forces contributed immensely. The author expresses deep gratitude to all of them for providing deep and pragmatic insights into the subject of deterrence and decision-making in various wars.

Professor (Dr) Rakesh Datta, Department of Defence and National Security Studies, Panjab University, Chandigarh has provided immense guidance right from the evolution stage to the present form. It was his in-depth knowledge, painstaking guidance, focused approach and appropriate direction that has enabled the successful completion of this research project. The author expresses immense gratitude to Dr Datta for mentoring and motivation despite his intensely hectic academic schedule. Colonel Harjeet Singh (Retired) assisted in the conception of the subject, formatting the chapters, providing regular inputs to refine the research work with a correlation of theory as well as the historical perspective of deterrence and decision-making for war to the present-day context. His guidance has been invaluable. The faculty of the Department of Defence and National Security Studies to include (Dr) Jaskaran Singh Waraich, Chairman, Professor (Dr) Meena Datta and other research scholars provided unstinted support. The author is indebted to all of them. The staff of Department of Defence and National Security Studies, the libraries of Punjab University, Institute of Defence Studies and Analysis (IDSA), United Service Institute (USI), Headquarters Western Command, 11 Corps and various formations and units provided willing support and assistance in making the books and journals available. The author is grateful and appreciates their contribution.

The author expresses deep gratitude to his family for their continuous support, patience and encouragement during the research work.
