CONCLUSION

Divorce is usually a product of multiple factors such as personal, family and environmental factors. When we were analyzing each divorce cases separately, we found that each case was unique. “Because each marriage has its unique features and process of adjustment and maladjustment differ from case to case” (Pothen, 1996). Using the available literature and data obtained from respondents and key personnel, the researcher arrived at certain conclusions.

Since child marriage and ‘instant Talaq’ are common in Malappuram district, it is necessary to register marriages in order to avoid child marriages and ‘mut’ah marriages’. Also Muslim community should have proper awareness regarding the practice of child marriage and the disparity in age between partners should be minimized.

Within the limitation of the objectives and hypotheses, the researcher analyzed various aspects of the Psychological Well-being and Quality of Life of Divorced Muslim Women. The researcher felt that the Muslim Women are predominant sufferers in divorce related issues. Apart from individual, familial and sociological issues, divorce also causes certain ecological issues. The major ecological issues related to divorce are poverty, unemployment, ill health, inadequate housing conditions etc. Moreover, it is revealed that divorce causes many psycho-social problems to women. The above mentioned ecological issues and psycho-social problems prevent the Muslim community from effective utilization of manpower and resources.

Provision of proper legal and psychological backup to divorced women and children is a balm to the wounded hearts. Facilitation of counseling services certainly acts as a rehabilitative step to ameliorate the status of Divorced Muslim Women. Promotion of Remarriage by eradicating dowry problem can change their ruthless fate. The social scientist, social workers and their professional bodies have significant role to play for the empowerment of Divorced Muslim Women. Above all, strict adherence to the Quranic concept that the best man is he who behaves well to his wife, if followed will make better behavioral pattern inside the family and thus reduces the rate of divorce.
