CONCLUSION

The small and village industries sectors have a tradition behind them but due to some unseen reasons they had been neglected sectors in Post Independent India. The inference from the data which suggest low rate of growth of employment in industries despite high growth of units should not be mean that the industrial scene has low employment potential. It indicates that policy measures are needed to increase employment by promoting larger investments in industrial units particularly by small entrepreneurs. Now the mind and energy of the central as well as state governments have been diverted towards their development and much headway has been noticed in this direction.
